"REST, PERTURBED SPIRIT."

We are sorry to see that our advice, given in a kindly way to the broken staff of our decrepit morning contemporary, the Tribune, was not received in that spirit which should characterize a Christian who is the recipient of such favors. But then it is the natural petulance of ill-health, and we can well afford to overlook it.

The Tribune, however, is guilty of a slight misstatement, strange as it may seem, in saying that "THE HERALD thinks one of the editors of the Tribune should be given leave of absence and granted a rest in which to recuperate." We did not say that one of the editors should be given a rest; we said it of all of them, and asked if Mr. Mackay, the anxious proprietor of the shaky concern, could not be prevailed on to work it to that issue. We will add that if the majority of them were given permanent leave of absence, it would do something towards improving the tone of the paper, though, nothing but absolute suspension, until "dead, dead, dead," would completely cure the evil or satisfy society.

The writer who takes up our gauntlet with such a tired air is not the most objectionable of the Tribune crew. We admit that he is talented, and believe that the best and cleanest things his paper contains, though "like angels' visits, few and far between," are the products of his pen. But he is in bad company, and like poor dog Tray must needs be beaten with many stripes. We do not suppose that he is the author of all the filthy and brutal effusions that disgrace the editorial columns of that sheet, but if he does not create he tolerates them and permits them to appear side by side with his own articles, and must therefore share in the odium which attaches to such things and the vile creatures whose mental spawn they are.

But he goes on to say: "Nothing but the necessities which force some men to work and the hope of doing something which shall finally make it clear to the men of Utah that he came here as a friend, and not an enemy, has kept that editor at his post." The first part of that sentence we believe, for we know it must be an awful necessity which would compel some men to work, particularly if born tired, or prematurely worn out in "storming the crags," and trying to make old phrases fit new places, for which they were never designed, or have been used, like handsome Eli's "got that" anecdote, several times too often. But as to the hope of doing something that shall make it clear that he came here, not for "necessity" alone, but as a friend to anybody but himself and the little ring of sore-head agitators who have ever been Utah's enemies, and are proving themselves such more and more every day, it will take something besides mere words, "sweet Hamlet," to convince the men of Utah, or the women either, of the purity and disinterestedness of your motive.

As to the remainder of the article it only serves to emphasize the truth of our remark in relation to the much needed respite from toil and turmoil absolutely required by the present mental condition of the most brilliant genius that ever came out of Nevada, from "necessity," to be both a friend and enemy to the people of Utah. "Rest, spirit, rest."

THE CREATIVE POLITICIAN.

The tearing open of supposedly healed wounds and dragging out from their cerements the corpses of what were thought to be dead issues, is becoming an industry in the country. At the risk of his reputation and standing as an apostle of the Republican faith, John Sherman embarked in this enterprise, and by the force of sheer audacity and desperation has created a nucleus around which probably cluster sufficient support and following to give the ghastly renaissance the semblance of old-time vitality and force. It looks very much as if the party Sherman represents was in a desperate condition and clatching madly at improbable chances, when it can afford to take the risk of reviving old grudges as its basis for a claim upon the further support and confidence of the people; that it can do so and win shows conclusively how completely this is a nation made up of parties first and citizens next; it also shows how entirely the latter depend upon the former and how unwilling they are to trust to "new departures" badly presented.

The Democratic party is the organization which more than any other is entitled to the designation of an experimenter. Strange as this may seem in the light of the charges made against it of being tied up in and inextricable from old-time principles and policies, it is nevertheless today the only exponent of anything recent that has been brought forward in connection with party conduct during the two decades last past; and it generally goes up or comes down because in either case its efforts are received for what they are worth. The country has about arrived at the conclusion that an old thing skillfully worked, is better than ever so many new ones bungled. Hence the success of Sherman; hence, also, the failure of Cleveland.

In Utah, where politics is an uncertain quantity, we can have our official novelties as well as the communities elsewhere. They do not gain such celebrity abroad, because of merely local application and relating more to the judicial than the political department of public affairs. The judiciary here conduct things to suit themselves, and as they do not depend upon the people for support or ratification, but upon a few men two thousand or more miles away, they have so far managed to have their good and bad work alike noticed. The administration delight in novelties, apparently; and the more novel the proceedings of our chief jurists, the more endeared to the President and his Cabinet they seem to become.

Gauging things by the present standard of success, we feel disposed to pronounce Judge Zane an able politician than John Sherman, and Judge Powers a long way ahead of President Cleveland, and dug up the remnants of an issue into which his lamented predecessor McKean sought to breathe the breath of life, but failed; the present judge has emboweled, carnated, sanguified, and pulsatized the lifeless cadaver, and made it for the present occasion a thing of our day. Sherman had a creation which was dying surely, but not quite dead, to work with, and has merely prolonged its existence for a while; Zane went to work on a "stiff" and limbered it into life. Then we come to Powers: He did not have a civil service ghost to materialize, but by diligent rummaging unearthed a better thing. The happy thought occurred to him all at once that as he was the first Democratic Judge Utah had had for a quarter of a century, he had a position as fruitful of opportunities as it was conspicuous before the public. He could make no appointments, cause no removals and do nothing in his sphere which had not been done before; but he was a target for the eyes of a part of the world at least—like the man who appointed him—and in this condition must not merely be an official, but, as Nasby says, "Do suthin' startlin' in that line." And then came to him, like an inspiration as it were, the doing of something compared with which the record of the Chief Justice (who is a Republican) would assume an oyster-like sliminess, an ashen-hued aspect; he could see him and go a few better. And he did. He is at it yet. The probabilities are that Judge Zane occasionally looks at the work being performed by his Democratic associate and says in his discomfiture—"We can do pretty well in the matter of making a stable out of a worn-out horse-shoe; but if you want an iron-foundry constructed out of a carpet-tack, you will have to fall back on Democratic principles."

Yes, America is essentially a nation of politicians, and the length and breadth of their capabilities in an emergency can only be measured by their consciences.

THE ACTION of the Tribune in calling in such frothing tones for a "Gentle" to represent the Gentiles in Washington, and the report which followed shortly after that Mr. Barkis Lannan was "willin'" to immolate himself by accepting the place, recalls an incident which once occurred in this office. An eager-faced boy one day entered with a note, which he laid before the book-keeper. It read: HERALD Printing and Publishing Company—The boy who delivers my HERALD is a lazy, unreliable, unreliable upstart. Either remove him or stop my paper. The bearer of this is my son, a boy whom I can recommend for the place, if you see fit to give it to him.

There is a slight misunderstanding among the hostile chieftains about the responsibility attached to affixing the signatures to that petition for Simpson's pardon. Judge Zane, however, remains silent. Now, if he could but be drawn into it some way, and the whole squad have a falling out, what a brilliant prospect for better times there would be!

THE Tribune attributes much of the bloodshed in southeastern Europe to "those who swore by the Cross or Crescent," and says both did it in the name of Him who counseled peace. Our rhetorical cotemporary is a first-class hand at literary legerdemain, but we never before heard of its undertaking so gigantic a metamorphosis as making an Ottoman do anything in the name or to the honor of Christ.
